

Cardinal Health statement February 25, 2020

“We continue our work to resolve this issue for our customers and the patients they serve. We now have the results of bioburden testing, and those results support our prior assessment that the safety risk to customers and patients is low. The testing showed that the microorganisms recovered and identified from the tested sample of gowns would not survive the sterilization process and are commonly found on medical devices prior to sterilization. Despite these findings, there is no change to our field actions for the gowns and the Presource packs containing the gowns at this time.”
